Select one of the first two web sites you made for this class (clay or handwriting) and give it thorough overhaul. You should look to the earlier site as content that you will arrange, display, and add to in new ways.

Your new site will be graded on how effectively you:

- devise a new architecture for your content
- employ typography (including the use of typefaces, type size, type color, character spacing, line spacing, and overall arrangement of type on the site)
- integrate at least one image map
- use internal and external links
- deploy a system for navigating the site
- use mouseover commands
- employ css to control your site
- use color (including black and white)
- take advantage of "empty" space

Remember, in revising your site, that you have an overall message to convey. This message can be expressed in many ways simultaneously. Every element on your site signifies something, so make that signification is deliberate and well considered. Your overall message may change from your original site, or it may stay the same.

On your new site, be sure to provide a link to your old site in its original version (as a point of comparison).
