WOMAN'S ELIGIBILITY TO OFFICE.

Chicago Tribune (1860-1872); Apr 4, 1869; ProQuest Historical Newspapers: Chicago Tribune

pg. 0_2

The "Woman's Question" has been a matter of considerable interest and discussion in the political circles of the United States for many years. The question of women's eligibility to office has been a topic of much debate and controversy. The Chicago Tribune, in an article from 1869, discusses the issue and presents the arguments for and against women's eligibility to hold public office.

The article begins by noting that the issue of women's eligibility to office has been a topic of much discussion. It then goes on to argue that women should be eligible to hold public office. The article cites examples of women who have been successful in politics and argues that women have the same qualifications as men and should be allowed to run for office.

The article also addresses the objections to women's eligibility to office. It notes that some argue that women are not capable of holding public office because of their inherent lack of political experience. The article counters this argument by pointing out that women have been successful in many areas of life and have the same potential for success in politics as men.

The article concludes by stating that the question of women's eligibility to office is one that should be decided by the people and their elected representatives. It calls for a fair and open debate on the issue and argues that women should be allowed to run for office and hold public office just as men are.

The article ends by noting that the issue of women's eligibility to office is one that will continue to be debated and that the ultimate decision will be made by the people through their representatives in government.