“The News-Herald”

WASHINGTON, D.C.

While the President was in the White House yesterday, the House of Representatives was in session. It is likely that before the session is over, the President will have to go to the Senate and ask for a bill to provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress. The bill is expected to be passed by the House and transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.

The President is expected to sign the bill, which will provide for the payment of salaries of the members of Congress, and the bill will then be transmitted to the Senate, where it will be read and referred to a committee to report it back to the Senate, where it will be debated and approved by a majority of the members present.