Mental Science Compared with Christian Science

By W. E. Griffith

Mental Science is what its detractors call "thought for the common man"; Christian Science is what its proponents call "the Science of God." But the two are not on the same level. Mental Science is a secular approach to understanding the mind and its processes, while Christian Science is a religious approach that views the mind as a reflection of the divine.

The battle of beliefs is not a battle of ideas, as some might assume. It is a battle of perception, of seeing the world through different lenses. Mental Science views the mind as a product of evolution and material processes, while Christian Science views the mind as a reflection of the divine will.

When Mental Science states that "the mind cannot deal with the immaterial," and indeed it does, the universe is the realm of the mind, it is a view of the universe that is not in harmony with the mental universe. It is a view that sees the universe as a reflection of the mind, and that is not in harmony with the mental universe.

We have seen that the universe is not a reflection of the mind, but rather the mind is a reflection of the universe. We are not the creators of the universe, but rather the universe is a reflection of us, the creators. We are not the masters of the universe, but rather the universe is a reflection of our minds.

The battle of beliefs is not a battle of ideas, but a battle of perception. It is a battle of seeing the world through different lenses, and it is a battle of understanding the mind as a reflection of the universe.
